tions the solar spots are in reality cavities, by which the bydrogen, and the varieus substances composing the solar atmosphere, escape from the photosphere, this bydrogen being the result of a decomposition, bringing with it positive electricity, which is distributed in the planetary spaces, diminishing in intensity more and more toward the earth, in consequence of the poor co-ducting power of the more and more deuse strata of the air, and of the superficial crust of the earth, this latter being negative only because it is less positive than the air.

For this electricity to be propagated in any medium, some substance is neces.

From the Dental Journal. The Perkins-Hyatt or Celluloid Base.

In the April number of the Journal, of 1871, we called the attention of our readers to this new base, and published, as an item of interest, the circular issued by the patentees, adding a word of caution against a too hasty adoption of what was then an untried experiment. Sufficient time has now clapsed to prove, we think, the utter worthlessness of this material as a base for artificial teeth, and agreeable to a promise made when we ook up the editorial quill, we publish the following list of experimental cases with this base, with the results, as our
